Simeon Oxley is currently working for Uppsala Språskolan (Language School) and teaching English as a mother tongue to school students of all ages.

He graduated from Cambridge in 2000 with a degree in French and Spanish and after a year working with seafarers in Dunkirk, he returned to do his secondary teacher training. After spending two years as a French and Spanish teacher in Norfolk, he moved to Sweden in 2004.

Having worked extensively with teaching English as a second language, adult education and with experience of teaching in different school settings and in different countries, he is now co-leading a project about distance teaching and mother tongue teaching with Uppsala University. He is also teaching teachers studying with the In-service training department at the University.

He also hopes to continue mentoring new teachers at Språskolan and see the distance project develop into a model that can be used for training and then implemented nationwide.
