K. Thomas McPeek is an Assistant Professor of Architecture at the University of Central Florida, where he specializes in studio pedagogy and design visualization.

In 2010, he came to the University of Central Florida from Southern Illinois University, where he helped to establish the recently accredited Master of Architecture program.

He earned his Ph.D. in Architecture from Texas A&M University, focusing on the use of collaborative methodologies in the design studio.

Prior to returning to school for his doctorate he spent a number of years in architectural practice in Atlanta, GA and Washington, D.C.

At UCF, Dr. McPeek teaches design studios at the third and fourth year levels, and courses in architectural history and design visualization.

Dr. McPeek specializes in design studio instruction focusing on the use of collaborative methodologies as a way of developing teamwork and leadership skills. Current research includes collaborative design methodologies and the 1893 World's Columbian Exposition.
