Lenka Mynaříková is a postgraduate student at the Department of Social Psychology and she works as a school psychologist at a primary school.

She graduated in Social Psychology at the Charles University in Prague in 2010. Since then she has been pursuing her postgraduate studies, specializing in deception detection and the use of art therapy and art-based methods in school environment.

Currently Lenka Mynaříková is working on a project funded by the Czech Fund Agency, trying to describe what distinguishes good and bad lie detectors and to improve methods of nonverbal deception detection.

She has written articles on deception detection, lying behavior, or on working with children in schools from the view of a school psychologist. She attended international psychological conferences in Vilnius, Madrid or Cyprus.

As a postgraduate student, she participates on teaching the undergraduate students about forensic psychology and social interactions.
